DELAWARE BECOMES THE 11TH STATE TO RECOGNIZE MARRIAGE EQUALITY

On May 8, Delaware Governor Jack Markell (D) signed the state's marriage equality bill into law, making "The First State" the 11th state to recognize same-sex couples' marriages. Delaware's law comes right on the heels of Rhode Island's recognizing same-sex unions just a week ago.

The act goes into effect on July 1, 2013, and civil unions, which Delaware recognized in 2011, will be recognized as marriages after one year.

The bill passed after long and heated debate in the Delaware Senate chamber. Opponents of the measure argued in favor of allowing people to discriminate against gay couples if they chose to do so, notwithstanding the fact that it is against the law in Delaware to discriminate against anyone based on their sexual orientation. Opponents of the bill also argued that marriage focuses on raising children and, thus, should be denied when gay couples are involved, disregarding the numerous gay couples in the state and elsewhere who are successfully rearing children for many years now.

During the final floor speeches, Sen. Karen Peterson (D) passionately shared her personal experiences as a lesbian with her colleagues — coming out publicly for the first time:

DELAWARE BECOMES THE 11TH STATE TO RECOGNIZE MARRIAGE EQUALITY

PETERSON: No one chose to be gay. We are what God made us. We don't need to be fixed. We aren't broken. [...]

My partner Vicki and I have been together for 24 years. Last year, we entered into a civil union. [...]

If my happiness somehow demeans or diminishes your marriage, you need to work on your marriage.

Minnesota and Illinois might soon join Delaware and the ten other states that have recognized same-sex marriages. Legislation similar to the one just passed into law in Delaware are ready for consideration in those two Midwestern states within a matter of days
